Close Races Expected In Third District

By JAMES H. RUBIN Associated Press Writer
CAMDEN — Two close senate races in south-central New Jersey that may have an important bearing on control of the new state legislature have the experts guessing.

The question marks involve two of four senate contests in the third district, which includes Salem, Gloucester and Camden Counties. The outcome of both tight races on Nov. 7 may also have considerable impact in determining seats.

The winners of four assembly Senate Majority Leader John A. Waddington, a Salem County Democrat, is facing a serious challenge from Assemblyman John White, R-Gloucester. Both sides claim they are confident of victory.

White contends that Waddington has been "a rubber stamp" for Gov. Richard J. Hughes' Democratic administration rather than "a strong voice" for his constituents in the rural farmland of Salem County. "He hasn't done what the people down here want," White said.

"Dirtiest Ever" Waddington characterized his opponent's tactics as "the dirtiest I've ever seen in 14 years of campaigning." The senator accused White of "trying to degrade me. His charges are based on misrepresentations and distortions."

One of the central issues is the state's spending policies. White contends that the Hughes administration has been wasteful in spending the new revenue from the state's three percent sales tax.

Waddington replies that White supported the budget when it was approved by the legislature but has now reversed himself and is attacking it.

The senator claimed that his constituents are "too sensible to vote for my opponent."

The outcome of the bitter contest is very much in doubt, largely because of the make-up of the district under a new reapportionment plan.

The new constituency combines Salem County, where Waddington polled a heavy plurality two years ago, and parts of traditionally Republican Gloucester.

White insists that the majority of the voters are in Republican areas. "That should work in my favor," he commented.

But Waddington argues that he will hold his own in the GOP stronghold of Gloucester and will roll up a sufficient margin in his home county to win by a comfortable margin.

Another Tossup A second senate race in a different section of the third district is also rated a tossup. The contest matches two men who are making their first run for the state legislature.

The Republican candidate is Hugh A. Kelly of Gloucester

Twp., a 44-year-old undersheriff of Camden County. His opponent is Joseph M. Sandone, 33, a hospital administrator who was a Camden County freeholder from 1948 to 1964.

Kelly asserts that the legislature needs "someone with law enforcement background." He also declares that "it's time for a change" in Democratic control of the legislature.

Sandone says he is also "a strong law enforcement man" but argues that his lengthy experience as a freeholder makes him better qualified than his opponent. "I know where the votes are and the people know me," he said.

They are running in a district that includes the remainder of Gloucester County and a portion of Camden County. Observers say the region can be considered a swing district.

The Democratic and Republican assembly tickets in Camden, Gloucester and Salem are sprinkled with new faces. However, Assemblyman John Davis, D-Salem, one of Waddington's running mates, is expected to bolster the Democratic slate.

Mayor Alfred R. Paro of Camden, a Democrat, is rated a solid favorite over Frank C. Italiano, a Camden Republican, in one of the two remaining races in the Third District.

GOP Given Edge The Republicans are accorded a commanding edge in the fourth contest. The GOP candidate is Assemblyman John L. Miller of Cherry Hill. His Democratic opponent is another assemblyman, Richard S. Hyland, also of Cherry Hill.

In the neighboring Fourth District of Burlington and Ocean Counties, Republicans are expected to sweep both senate seats and all four assembly seats.

The Republican candidates seeking re-election to the senate are William T. Hiering of Toms River and Edwin B. Forsythe of Moorestown, the GOP senate minority leader. Their opponents respectively are Eugene E. Helbig, Democrat of Toms River, and Edward J. Hughes Jr. of Cinnaminson.

Soviets Plan Arab Nations For Navy Bases

SEATTLE — AP — The Soviet Union is establishing naval bases in Egypt and other Arab countries to support its growing Mediterranean fleet, Sen. Henry M. Jackson, D-Wash., said Sunday.

Jackson added that recent reports Russia is building its first aircraft carrier "does not bode well for the Western world."

The senator, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, commented in an interview and in an address to the Jewish War Veterans.

Jackson said the Soviets are using Alexandria, Egypt, and Suez for supporting what he called "their activity and mischief" in the Middle East.
